

The paper discusses Bernard Bolzano's argument to the effect that there is at least one substance if there are any concrete individuals at all. It defends the argument against recent criticisms raised by Schnieder (2002). And it discusses its relation to an influential companion argument that relies on a similar argumentative idea: the Bennett/van Inwagen argument against the Principle of Sufficient Reason.