

The paper critically assesses evolutionary explanations of human attitudes towards risk found in the philosophical literature. Drawing on an analogy with existing critiques of evolutionary explanations of human mating preferences, the paper challenges the view that there are universal risk preferences in the human population to be explained by an adaptationist account.